Coverage for Condominium Owners

Why Coverage is Necessary:

- ▶ A tenant slipped and fell in the common lobby area and sustained a severely fractured leg and wrist. The tenant filed suit against the condo association and its members for bodily injuries, and the suit included a demand for replacement of the slippery tile material in the lobby. The condo association's insurance policy covered the bodily injury claim of the tenant; however, the tile replacement was not covered. The condo association replaced the tile with non-skid material and assessed each condo owner member in the amount of $2,000 toward this cost. The condo owner made a claim under his condo owners policy and was reimbursed the $2,000 assessment fee under loss assessment coverage.
- ▶ A condo owner's new sound system caught fire, causing extensive damage. The fire spread to six floors, resulting in property damage due to fire, smoke and water. Claims were submitted against the condo owner for the property damage of other unit owners along with bodily injury claims for smoke inhalation of some residents. A firefighter was also injured. The condo owners policy investigated the loss and determined that a product defect existed in the sound system. As a result, the manufacturer accepted responsibility and paid all claims arising from the fire. The condo owners policy paid $45,000 in the investigation and defense of the policyholder.
- ▶ A former tenant sued a condo owner for negligence and wrongful eviction, alleging lack of habitability due to infestation of bedbugs while residing at the condo. The lawsuit demanded $100,000, including medical treatment for bites, replacement of their property and additional living expenses while locating new living quarters. The condo owner's policy paid for the defense attorney, and the tenant's claim was settled.
